Fine Art

My subjects have been urban scapes, and, more recently, I work exclusively on commission, creating Home and Garden Portraits. These works are highly personalized, becoming an illustration of your life and family. Several publications including the Vancouver Sun, TV and CBC radio have composed stories reflecting interest in the unique and colourful nature of my work. Although I work on commission, I work regularly for fund raisers, and exhibit my work upon request for this purpose.

Applied Art Projects

Owned and operated an illustration company since 1981. As a design consultant for architects I produce architectural renderings from plans which are used for design concepts and communication media for the client, as well as promotion. Further, I have produced illustration for varied applications, including several book jackets, and other projects for publishers.

Teaching and Workshops

I have taught art courses in post-secondary schools since 1987. Courses have included: Basic and Advanced Drawing Technique – graphite and mixed media; Applied Colour Theory – marker and pencil crayon and watercolour; The Illustrated Journal, for architectural and design students and beginners – mixed media; Drawing on the Right Side of the Brain and other courses. I have also created workshops in Creative Problem Solving using drawing as a catalyst. These were done at UBC, Douglas College and architectural firms. Additionally, I designed a course called English Through Art for a large English language school in Vancouver.

Fine Art

The study of music created a reverence of form and its innate beauty. The act of marrying personal content and form prompted me to realize the inseparability of the two: form can be as individual as the content it frames and serves. Composition requires mastery of the two. Execution of visual art requires the same attention — in its different form.

I am ever fascinated with the relationship between things living and inanimate, and my interest is reflected by imbuing the non-living with an alchemical sense of life. Those things we view as ordinary, utilitarian or man-made are an integral part of our city, home and environment. They have integrity and are therefore beautiful.

I endeavour to give spirit to that which might only be set apart by a mundane definition of what is alive or dead: any object becomes an objet d'art when given attention.

Home and Garden Portraits

These paintings are very personal. I include all the important things in a person's life and their family's. It can include the cat, dog, the favourite plant and flower, the radial arm-saw, the wheelbarrow, whatever your heart desires!

Teaching

Students come from a variety of experience, often in one class. Some are professional artists working in applied and fine art while others have no experience in a studio. The latter see a marked improvement very quickly when it comes to realistic drawing, while for the more experienced artist, the classes provide a series of checks allowing them to see exactly how they are perceiving their subject. I use many of the ideas of Betty Edwards, and the students are taken through a number of technical exercises, and in a longer course, taken back to drawing from life

I am providing two examples of what are very typical results. In the first sample, the student is a graduate from Emily Carr School of Art. As illustrated (below), one can appreciate the difference in the technique and expression from the first class, which is a drawing of a fellow student, to the self portrait followed by the drawing of the model. I place emphasis on the care and attention to detail, composition and quality of the line in the contour drawing. The tonal exercises help the student bring light and form later on in life drawing.

I show these examples because they are typical of the kind of progress made. I regard drawing technique as a form of literacy as opposed to an endowed talent, and the students are encouraged to use the technical knowledge for personal expression, not as an end in itself. I am an encouraging and playful teacher, and I endeavour to create a warm and safe environment. I find teaching sometimes very exciting and quite often extremely satisfying.

Applied Art Projects

Architectural Illustration is created from the plan and elevation, creating a two point perspective view. A rough drawing is developed to include all architectural details as well as entourage to create an attractive painting or drawing which can be used for the city Design Panel, the client, or other promotional materials including brochures and ads. The media can be marker and pencil crayon, watercolour or pen and ink.

This is a sample of a book jacket I have designed and illustrated.
